McIntire was born in Oklahoma in 1906. He was raised in a fundamentalist home, and he became a Christian at a young age. McIntire attended Bob Jones University, and he later became a pastor at several churches in the Midwest.

In 1937, McIntire founded the Bible Presbyterian Church in Collingswood, New Jersey. The church quickly grew, and McIntire became a popular speaker and writer. McIntire also founded the American Council of Christian Churches (ACCC), an organization that sought to unite fundamentalist churches in the United States.

In the 1950s, McIntire became increasingly involved in politics. He was a vocal critic of communism, and he supported the efforts of Senator Joseph McCarthy to root out communists in the United States. McIntire also founded the Christian Freedom Foundation, an organization that sought to defend the rights of fundamentalists who were being persecuted for their beliefs.

In the 1960s, McIntire became a leading figure in the Christian right. He was a strong supporter of the Vietnam War, and he opposed the civil rights movement. McIntire also founded the National Prayer Network, an organization that sought to mobilize Christians to pray for the United States.

McIntire died in 2002. He was a controversial figure, but he was also one of the most influential figures in the history of American fundamentalism.

The Politicization of American Fundamentalism

The politicization of American fundamentalism is a complex process that has been going on for decades. There are a number of factors that have contributed to this process, including the rise of the Christian right, the decline of mainline Protestantism, and the increasing polarization of American society.

The Christian right is a political movement that is composed of evangelical and fundamentalist христиане. The Christian right emerged in the 1970s, and it has since become a major force in American politics. The Christian right has been successful in mobilizing its supporters on a number of issues, including abortion, school prayer, and same-sex marriage.

The decline of mainline Protestantism has also contributed to the politicization of American fundamentalism. Mainline Protestant denominations have been losing members for decades, and this has led to a corresponding increase in the influence of evangelical and fundamentalist churches. Evangelical and fundamentalist churches are more likely to be politically active than mainline Protestant churches, and this has helped to fuel the growth of the Christian right.

The increasing polarization of American society has also contributed to the politicization of American fundamentalism. American society has become increasingly polarized in recent years, and this has led to a corresponding increase in the polarization of American religion. Evangelical and fundamentalist христиане are more likely to be conservative than other religious groups, and this has led to a corresponding increase in the influence of conservative religious groups in American politics.

The politicization of American fundamentalism has had a number of consequences. It has led to a more conservative Supreme Court, it has helped to pass laws that restrict abortion and same-sex marriage, and it has helped to create a more hostile environment for religious minorities. The politicization of American fundamentalism is a major trend in American society, and it is likely to continue to have a significant impact on American politics for years to come.
